

Resource Conservation and Productivity: Evidence from Ethiopia

Using a set of multi-year randomized control trials in Ethiopia, we investigate how tailored plot-specific information about soil conservation practices affects adoption and welfare implications in the medium run. Results show that tailored information increased the likelihood of adoption of sustainable practices and this, in turn, improved land productivity for maize producers.